

Published based on Five Considerations to Help You Appraise a Jewelry Item

Five Considerations to Help You Appraise a Jewelry Item

The best way to appraise jewelry is to let a professional jewelry appraiser perform it for you. In fact, several appraisals will be more likely to obtain the true value of the article. Appraisers or gemologists of Jewelry auction houses could be the most reliable, as they would have been shown earliest articles, authentic ones, fakes and copies, more than other appraisers and must be more knowledgeable about jewelries in general. A lot of articles are sold through Jewelry auctions, and since each one should be authenticated, the appraiser must easily recognize your piece of jewelry and thus appraise it.

Yet you can do some personal appraisal or quick assessment of an article at hand if you are familiar with and understand a few bits about it or its relatives. Of course jewelry pieces are not like automobiles that field many units of a single model and make, so a piece of jewelry may only have one or two identical duplicates. To evaluate a piece of jewelry, you can:

Look at the original receipt of purchase: It is immaterial when the piece was acquired, the purchase invoice will give you a distinct concept of its value. Simply adjust the old pecuniary value to modern equivalents. You might have to calculate the antique value, though.

Contrast it with similar items via the Internet: Research online for similar pieces and know how much they are worth. It must give you a scale of the probable price of your article, since gems differ in cut, color or size and thus are valued differently.

Map its history: Family heirlooms are often precious, indicated by being chosen for retention and passing on. It is a good idea to query its history with family members to obtain an indication of its value. If discovered in a garage or rummage sale, inquire of the owner about its history, or {even|perhaps] tale. A few can be more precious than their prices.

Understand the value of its stones and metals: Gold, silver, alloys, diamonds, rubies, pearls and others retain their own relative values. Knowing the prices will aid you determine the price scale of your piece of jewelry, ancient or new.

Be wary of fakes: Too perfect a precious stone and it would probably be a phony. Diamonds devoid of flaws and perfectly round pearls will not be sold for even regular prices, moreso for small sums, even in a financial depression. Be suspicious and wary when presented with such pieces.

A heavier gold ring is normally worth more than a lighter one, though not in every case. It is based on the purity of the gold used and the stones (if there are) set in it. All factors being equal, the heavier one should be priced more.

The foregoing suggestions are of course not embedded in stone and instead are simply simple methods to determine a jewel's value. Each piece of jewelry is worth apart from the other, except for generic bands of gold. Furthermore, their possessors value them differently, too, aside from their worth in humanistic or other terms. But in the minimum, performing the above will give you a perception what the true assessed value will be.

You can also find this article published on Five Considerations to Help You Appraise a Jewelry Item, and on the tag pages article, course, family heirlooms, history, Jewelry auction, silver alloys.